Phytobezoars are made up of ingested fibrous plant material that have accumulated in the stomach and have prevented the normal digestion and absorption of nutrients from food. As a result, nutrient deficiencies and growth retardation are common. One method of tackling the problem is to introduce an agent that can break up phytobezoars. A retrospective study was carried out on 44 patients who had undergone endoscopic procedures to treat gastric phytobezoars. Intravenous omeprazole was introduced as an agent to treat phytobezoars. All of the patients were reviewed after treatment. Remission was achieved in all of the patients; 92.5% were symptom-free, and no side-effects occurred. There were no symptoms during the follow-up, and there were no complications. Surgical methods remain the mainstay treatment for phytobezoar-related complications.
